A new series from the author of The Murdoch Mysteries. Set after the First World War, the Paradise Café series explores the complexities of post-war life and the challenges faced by returning veterans.

In this fourth book in the series, March roars in and Charlotte Frayne, P.I., receives a letter asking her to help prevent “a grave miscarriage of justice.” The sender is Miss Olivia Brodie, an elderly resident in the Toronto House of Industry (the Poor House) who claims she witnessed two men on a nearby street, behaving in a suspicious manner. She has learned that two Black teenagers have been charged with burglary on that same street. They will be severely punished. She is sure these boys are innocent; the men she saw are the culprits.

Charlotte is then hired by a Mrs. Emmeline Larkin, who says she is missing some precious jewelry; she fears the thief may be a member of her own social circle. A club of well-positioned women. These two cases take Charlotte back to connected events in the past, where there was, indeed, grave injustice.

“The second book in the Paradise Café series featuring private investigator Charlotte

Frayne and it’s even better than the first. Jennings ... proves that Canadian history is far from dull.” – The Globe and Mail
